The state has invested too much money in the navigation project to incur even a remote risk of subordinating the needs of navigation in the slightest degree to the development of water power. Prospective barge operators on the barge canal must be given no reason to entertain the slightest fear of such a hazard. There is. only one way to avoid that risk, and that is by state development and ownership of both projects and the absolute control of both by the superintendent of public works. We should not be deterred from stopping waste by the bogey of state ownership, nor should we incur the risk of subordinating the needs of navigation to power development incident to the introduction of a private power plant with a capacity of developing all the power available from the fear that the state...
