Excerpt: .no less surprise than joy, that amongst the companions of the runaway was included his spouse, Marien Rufa. Meantime, the fugitives were rapidly ap preaching the town of Guadix, the native place of Theodora. But with what throbbing hearts the travellers proceeded on their journey, and how diflerent were the feelings that gave expression to their features! A thousand sensations agitated the bosom of Theodora; fear, hope, and filial love, alternately disputed the mastery, whilst the countenance of the renegade evinced nought but a dreary isolation of feeling; revenge alone reigned in his heart uncontrolled, and undisputed. The two inferior personages were likewise indulging in reflections consonant to their nature and.habits. A vacant joy, a happy riddance from astate of fear and thraldom, predominated in the heart of Roque, whilst a curious amalgamation of gratified spite and returning superstition claimed that of Marien Rufa, But, however dilferent the sentiments by which they were actuated, the travellers evinced an equal joy when their anxious look caught the first glimpse of Guadix, which now stood before them softly enveloped in the twilight shadows. Welcome! dear lady, cried Roque, joyfully, once more behold your home. Home, delightful thrilling word! It went to the heart of Theodora in a tumultuous flow of pleasing, yet painful sensations. She now returned to the scenes of her innocenceand happiness, but it was also the theatre of her disgrace and sorrow. What agitation did she feel as every well known object presented...
