Excerpt: . . . to music under my Dispeopling scythe to slay, to bleed and die; And bards employ the magic of their lyre The thoughtless youth with fervor to inspire, For gory battles and the cannons fire, While you, my mates, are loathed by every worm, Not yours is pomp, nor pride nor uniform! He ended thus, and verified his boasts By hurling down a shoal of gloomy ghosts, Who, like a frightened flock of threatend sheep, Did huddle close, but yet seemed quite asleep, Unconscious of their state and of the place. They represented every soil and race And stood there bathed in blood, transpierced, all In arms, with gushing wounds that caused their fall. XVII. Now Plague with glance, which on frail mortals cast Doth freeze the blood and makes them breathe the last, A shower of pestiferous arrows spread, . As if once more she longed to wound the dead, Whom she in crowds discharging sent adown, A host of trembling spectres black and brown; And Murder, worst of fiends, devoured by spleen, With dastardy in look and visage grim, Now taciturn on the infernal heath The victims left whom he had slain beneath. And last desponding, hopeless Suicide, A female stern and dark as Plutos bride, The saddest group of unsubstantial dead Upon the hellish grounds deposited. The Gorgons to depict no words suffice, A second changed their grisly volumes thrice; At last dissolved upon their train of night Conjointly they vanished from...
