Excerpt from Feudalism in American Politics It is a thing pleasing to every patriotic man that the young men of this nation are displaying an increasing activity in politics. As the country grows richer and the people become more settled in habits and customs, a larger share of popular attention is naturally given to public affairs. Colleges and universities, through their courses of study in the political and social sciences, are forming an educated public opinion in men trained to reason and to think; and the participation of such men in the discussion of present day problems will add tremendously to their right solution. Under the general subject, Feudalism in American Politics, certain baneful and dangerous tendencies will be considered, not because the evil situation is a hopeless one, but because its efficacious remedy can be so easily applied. It is not intended to present a pessimistic or unwholesome view of political conditions in America. On the contrary, the purpose is to arouse in capable hearts an aspiration for the destruction of public abuses through a saving sense of civic obligation. Politics is government. The right to govern in America is not placed in one man, as in a monarchy, nor in a few men, as in an oligarchy, but it is the heritage which every citizen receives from the fathers. The fatal neglect of that heritage invites its decay. Its preservation requires that every American should be in politics, - not for office, for that is the last thing a young man should seek - but to guard the State. While some progress has been made in establishing a civil service in this country,...
