Forgotten Books, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from The Dominican Republic: Agriculture and Trade The Dominican Republic, situated in the heart of the Caribbean, is often termed the Cradle of the Americas. Santo Domingo, the capital, is the oldest permanent settlement of European origin in the Americas. While the Spaniards were pushing out toward continental America, this settlement became the hub of Spanish influence in the New World. The original Indian strain found in the country has long since lost its identity in the population. Today the principal racial strains are comprised of the descendants of the early Spanish colonists and of Negro slaves imported from Africa. About 15 percent of the population is white, 15-percent Negro, and 70 percent of mixed blood. Like most of the Latin American countries, the Dominican Republic depends on a small number of agricultural products for its income. Agricultural activities have long been directed largely to the production of the major export crops, particularly sugar. Not only does the country lean heavily on sugar exports to provide foreign exchange, but internal trade and employment are widely influenced by the foreign market which determines how much, and at what price, sugar can be sold abroad. The industrial sector is small but growing. Processing sugarcane is the principal industry, but other established plants are turning out cement; glass; textiles; bags, rope, and binder twine of sisal; such products as soaps, detergents, and toothpaste; cement and asbestos water pipe; furfural; flour; and meat and dairy products. In addition, there are several shoe and leather goods factories, garment factories, and many other smaller industries in the country. The Government is encouraging foreign investment, and in October 1962 passed a law which provided greater protection to agents of...
