When the teachers made special records for the retarded children in May and June, some of them took the register age of September, or the time when the children entered school, but their grade for May and June. As there was a mid-year promotion, the grade of the children was raised but their age remained the same as that of the enrolment figures. According to the enrolment figures, therefore, from which it appeared that 3372 children were retarded, a child may have been nine years old and in the first grade in September, thus being retarded; but according to the statistical investigation this same child was taken as nine years old the following-May, even though it had in the meantime been promoted to the second grade, in consequence of which it was not retarded. In this another cause appears for the discrepancy in the number of retarded children as found by the analysis of the enrolment figures and the statistical investigation. I have already shown how the number of retarded children as found by the statistical investigation was further reduced by the clinical investigation. In determining the amount of retardation for the 1000 children who are the subjects of this study, I assumed that seven years was the normal age for the first grade, eight years the normal age for the second and so on for the other grades. 13 ut how is this to be justified, for it is evident that...
