Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: .to be ploughing in a furrow of fire, and each onward stroke of her cut-water, seems to give birth to a thousand sparks of light; the track too of the porpoise, and other large fishes, is easily discernible; being marked by a gleaming line of light, now pursuing a straight course, and now wheeling and circling in endless variety. Note 3.--Stanza XVI. And seem mysteriously to shun, The swiftest race that bark can run.--P. 35, I have often, when at sea, amused myself with watching the circular line of horizon maintain its invariable distance; there it is, seeming to bar your further progress, but continually receding at your approach. Note 4.--Song. Away, away, my bounding bark.--P. 36. These lines were written at sea, on a beautiful July evening; the sun just dipping his broad orb in the western waste of waters, and Cape Clear looming faintly in the distance. It was the first time the ocean had hid my native shores from my view; and with a feeling, nearly akin to despair, I left the white cliffs of Albion, without a wish to return to them again. A promontory on the Bouth coast of Ireland. Jates to Caato Cjiitii. Note 1.--Stanza IV. Where Cortez legions trod of yore.--P. 43. Fernando Cortez, with his Spanish legions, conquered the Indian empire of Mexico, in the earlier part of the sixteenth century (1521). Note 2.--Stanza IV. Oh! where is Montezuma now?--P. 43. Montezuma was an emperor of Mexico; not...
