Excerpt from The Non-Resistance Principle: With Particular Application to the Help of Slaves by Abolitionists Although, in my judgment, the enterprise of John Brown in Virginia fell short, in one particular, of conformity to the highest rule of life, admitting a mixture of evil among the instruments and processes by which he undertook to overcome evil, still, I must regard and characterize that enterprise as a noble one; noble in its spirit and purpose towards the enslaved, and in its self-sacrificing and persevering devotion to their cause, and noble also in the openness and directness with which he confronted the Slave Power in their defence. In these latter particulars, John Brown, really feeling for those in bonds as hound with them, was unspeakably in advance, not only of the Church and the State in general, but of their most advanced ranks: both of the voters for the Massachusetts Personal Liberty Bill, and of the far smaller and more timid number who formed the Church Anti-Slavery Society. It was inevitable that such a man, seeing the miserable inadequacy of both these movements, should utterly refuse cooperation with them.
