Excerpt from A Study of the Microscopic Phenomena of Inflammation: With Special Reference to the Diapedesis of the White Blood Corpuscle The connection between the two was generally easily seen, but sometimes one occurred without the visible presence of the other, and their connection became obscured, but there came a day when the microscope was introduced into medical research and then the production of inflammation and fever were closely studied and light was shed on what was before darkness. By careful experiment the following facts have been proved regarding the origin of inflammation. First, there is, on irritating the tissue experimented upon, a contraction, followed by a dilation of the capillaries, then a migration through the capillary walls of leucocytes or white blood corpuscles, which spread into, and increase in the surrounding tissue then a blood stasis in the dilated capillaries and a congestion in the inflamed area. These are accompanied by disturbance in the nutritive processes and a heightened temperature. With the thought in my mind that we learn new things only by more carefully and patiently observing old ones, I spent nearly all of the three months in the Summer of 93 in studying beneath the microscope the following phenomena of commencing inflammation: dilatation of the capillaries, slowing of the blood stream, and the escape of the leucocytes or white blood corpuscles from the blood vessels into the surrounding tissue. I made these observations with but little hope of discovering any new facts where such observers as Cohnheim, Lister, Stricker, Bottcher and others had so carefully and scientifically worked but simply to convince my own mind of the truth of their revelations, and to decide, if possible, certain points...
