Ah! where shall we so sweet a dwelling find? - Thomson s Castle of Indolence. I. Come, shall I tell you of a pleasant place, Where much of pleasure with small sadness dwelled - Where every day each other day would chase Past our glad eyes, unknowing which excelled: For its fresh air and exercise dispelled All sadness from the bounding, healthy heart Quenched carking care, and all ambition quelled, Till every dweller loved to play his part, And pleasure give and take by every gentle art. II. Perhaps the beauty of that peaceful scene Sprung from our fancy more than nature great; But yet throughout its sweet and wide demesne Was much variety and solemn state - Much deep soft calm, and much of wilder trait Breathed from the mountain brown, the fertile glen; The daisied lea, in winter s depth so green, And savage rock, long moor and mossy fen, And over-changing sea, and cultured paths of men. About the...
