Excerpt from The Archon, Vol. 2: January, 1914 Whether Towne had eaten a little too much pie for lunch, or had been up too late the night before, we can not state positively, but after he had finished his repast, he went up to his room, got out his Chemistry book and began to study. He was reading about the various important discoveries by noted chem ists. And began to get real interested. But at last, overcome by his three pieces of pie, his mind wandered from the page, and he soon was over in the laboratory. First donning his rubber aprons and sleeves, so as to be a regular guy he went over to the Cabinet full of chemicals, and began to e.
