Although Mary had displayed her dislike for the Equerrv in a manner most agreeable to his wishes, still he thought that he should now learn something of more importance. Mary, however, answered nothing; she sat With downcast eyes, looking as though she were ready to weep. Answer! said the Equerry in a still more irritated tone. I will know whom thou lovest; because, hadst thou not loved another, thou would not have treated me in this way. Do not think so. You may be sure that even if I did not love another, I would treat you as I have done. No! I swear by heaven, that thou wouldst not then have treated me thus; but it is thy coldness which irritates me; but in spite of the Baron. . . Ah, I observe that thou recoverest thy charming roses! But...
