Audrey Thorney entered the Rosaline convent in 1960, a year recognized as a watershed by historians of womens religious life in America. The postwar vocation surge was at its peak, and the exodus in which two of every three nuns would leave their convents still lay ahead. As Sister Emmanuel, Audrey Thorney was under the direction of Sister Wulfram, a novice mistress considered brutal even by the standards of the era. Sister Wulfram terrorized the postulants and novices in her charge, and her ruthless bullying drove some to desperate measures. After two-and-a-half years in Sister Wulframs novitiate, Sister Emmanuel professed temporary vows and was sent to a college for nuns and then was assigned to teach in her orders schools. As the Catholic Church in general was experiencing the changes brought about by the Second Vatican Council, and as womens communities in particular were adjusting to the ideas introduced by the Sister Formation movement and by Cardinal Suenens, Sister Emmanuel was dealing with troubled fellow religious and with priests beset by personal problems and openly contemptuous of nuns.
