A Few Crusted Characters If we enter Dorchester by the London Road we shall see, on our right hand, just at the commencement of the town, an inn bearing the name of the White Hart, a fine wooden specimen of that animal gracing the top of the porch. On any market day we may find the yard in front of the inn thronged with carriers vans, all typical of the particular van mentioned in the short tales we are examining. Burthen, Carrier to Longpuddle, is the title it bears, and in Longpuddle we shall recognise a strong resemblance to the villages of Pydelhinton and Pydeltrenthide, the apt naming of the fictitious place striking us at once as we explore the two long straggling villages which are practically connected to each other. Let us follow Burthen s van as it starts from the White Hart. First come the open meadows--the DurnoverMoor of the Wessex Novels--Grey s Bridge occurring about midway; then, taking the left-hand road, we climb Waterstone, or Climmerstone Ridge--scene of the poem entitled The Revisitation --by way of Slyre s Lane, which brings us to the summit by a series of rises and dips. Once at the top of the hill, the road descends into the valley of the Pydele and follows that little stream upwards, the road running parallel with the river. According to local repute, the district is one wherein a man can neither live nor...
