Whilst uttering this appalling ban, He scarcely look d like mortal man: Not that above its wonted size His lofty stature seem d to rise, Or that his gestures, fierce and wild, Assum d a madman s frantic air, As when, beguiling, or begiil d, Apollo s priestess tore her hair, And from her lips, white-foaming first, The words of art, or phrenzy, burst. Calm and-compos d his tranquil look, No limb, convnls d, or feature, shook. From his serene, and steady, eye Beam d the fix d gaze of prophesy, Which saw, tho to none else reveal d, Events which time s dark shades conceal rf. A prophet s dignity was seen, In his sedate, collected, mien, And in his accents, firm and clear, A prophet s voice all seem d to hear. That voice had ceas d--and still as...
