Excerpt: .of the baccalaureate, there were antecedent conditions, --to be twenty-one years of age, unmarried, to have passed the determination, either at Paris or some university which possessed a determinate number of regents, etc. There was some wisdom in these precautions taken by the Middle Ages in order to prove that the aspirants 1,1 The mastership, says Thurot, was to the licentiate what the wedding party is to the nuptial benediction; a ceremony celebrated in honor, and on occasion of, the Sacrament that has just been received. for degrees had pursued a regular course of studies; but the rules too often remained a dead letter. The examination itself took place in the presence of the chancellor, assisted by various examiners chosen by him.1 It was not public, but what was then called an examination in camera. Nevertheless, at certain periods, the candidate was obliged to give a public lecture. The examination was on grammar, logic, Aristotle's physics and morals, and also, as it appears, on the elements of mathematics and astronomy.2 It must not be forgotten, either, that the bachelors, as real apprentices, must at once practise teaching and give lessons to those of their younger comrades who were aspiring to the baccalaureate. In his opusculum entitled De Conscientia, Robert de Sorbon3 has given the most precise details concerning the examinations undergone by the candidates for the licentiate. The candidate, already a bachelor, sought the chancellor, and received from him a book upon which...
