Excerpt: . . . Subsurface ADCP Data in the Equatorial Pacific 11 shift in the backscattered acoustic energy from a range set to be 0. 5 m to 2. 0 m vertically from the instrument. The beam-direction velocities, computed from the measured Doppler shift for each beam, are converted to earth coordinates using the relative transducer orientation and a Precision Navigation compass. The Argonaut-MDs were generally set to collect data once per second for 180 seconds at a 600-second interval. The theoretical accuracy of the Argonaut-MD velocity measurement is 1. 8 cm s and the compass is 2. 0. Early tests by PMEL indicated that the Argonaut-MD measurements compared well with coincident ADCP velocities, but later comparisons revealed that the Argonaut-MD horizontal current speed was biased low (Freitag et al. , 2003). Investigation revealed that the bias was due to the inability of the Argonaut-MD compass tilt-sensor (Precision Navigation model TCM2) to function properly on...
