THE FALCONS PRIZE Then he was close, a finger placed gently beneath her chin. Nell, he breathed, his voice low. She craned her head to look into his amber eyes, which blazed like the Texas sun. There is a chance I may never see you again. His eyes searched her face as if he were trying to memorize it and lingered on her lips. You'll always belong to Bennet, but this moment, this moment is mine, and I'd be a fool not to take it, so you'll have to forgive me. He grasped her shirt with his other hand and gently drew her to him, lowered his head, and took her lips in a fierce kiss. Her heartbeat quickened. She was helpless to withhold and kissed him back just as fiercely, her hands winding into his midnight-black hair. They were alone. This was not a kiss for show, not a kiss to fool strangers into believing they were lovers soon to be married. There was undeniable need and tension in the way he held her and touched her, the way...
