Forgotten Books, United States, 2015. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****. Excerpt from Labor Restriction Abroad and at Home Labor, in its recent movement for a larger share in the profits of production, and its assumption of right to dictate to capital by methods subversive of the recognized laws of society, seems to have placed in the background the more reasonable claim which it once made so prominent, - that of uniform restriction, by legislation, of the hours of labor. This is a question in which Statesmanship, Capital, and Labor should be in accord: Statesmanship, in obedience to the laws of our political economy, which require that economic legislation should have in view the interests of human welfare as well as the production and distribution of wealth; Capital, through its direct interest in the permanent efficiency of labor, in the improvement and contentment of working populations, in a progress which it will share, in a contentment which will be its own best security; while Labor should see that in the solution of this question lies the most certain and available means of improving its condition. Protectionists, whether statesmen or manufacturers employing capital, cannot consistently decline to meet this question. They are not incumbered, like the free-traders, with the laissez faire doctrine that there should be no interference by the nation with the rights of individuals. They claim that it is the highest function of the Government, so far as the Constitution permits, to legislate for the protection of labor, and for the industrial development of the nation. They appeal to the people, and rightfully too, to support a protective policy, because it raises the wages of labor.
