Excerpt: . . . On taking up their residence at Portsmouth, Commissioner Grey and his wife devoted themselves to good works. The strong character of the wife deepened the seriousness of the husband, and both of them, in their respective spheres, pursued a course of Christian philanthropy. Experience had shown them the greivous neglect of religion and morality which prevailed in the navy, and they set to work to make things better. The work of missions to seamen, which has made such advances in the present day, was practically begun by Commissioner and Mrs. Grey. Amongst those employed in the dockyard, and amongst the sailors and soldiers who embarked for foreign service, they were active for good. Stores of bibles and other books were sent out on board the ships; sick sailors were cared for, and orphans were befriended. The Commissioners House at Portsmouth was a centre of benevolent activity. The religious views of Commissioner and Mrs. Grey were strongly evangelical, and they numbered amongst their friends William Wilberforce, Charles Simeon, and the chiefs of the Evangelical party. They did not think it wise to expose their sons to the temptations of a public school. Their eldest son, George, was committed at the early age of eight to the care of an evangelical clergyman, Rev. William Buckle, Vicar of Pyrton, near Tetsworth, who received a few pupils into his house. Mr. Buckle was a good scholar, and a man of considerable attainments. His views of life were somewhat...
