Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: .as possible, even to the simplest detail, in imitation of the original Municipal methods as placed in Portland, Lockport and Denver. They have even copied the standard of volts and the form of cut-out. The fact that they have not duplicated this plant would seem, however, to indicate that they have found some difficulties in operation in which perhaps they have not succeeded in obtaining the results of the Edison Company s experiments. For the past ten years Charles Heisler, of St. Louis, has been with commendable pertinacity endeavoring to develop some practical notion in electric lighting. While the arc light was still young, he advertised with great flourish of trumpets, that he had succeeded perfectly in subdividing the arc unit of 2,000 c. p. so as to get any power which might be required with substantially no loss in economy. Like many other of the booming pretensions in the electric light field, this has never been put in practice, and after some years he was obliged to abandon this particular line of experiment. Latterly the company formed to exploit his inventions (which has recently made extraordinary efforts to unload its patent rights and business) has undertaken to imitate the Edison Municipal. Of course, in order to cover distance, it was necessary to copy us in using a large number of low volt lamps in series. In addition to this, Heisler has proposed to go us one better by arranging an automatic control of the current...
