English surgeon, to be near the spot, should his valuable professional services be required. Having said I, a full hour to spare before the terrible meeting, suppose we take a tiffen and bottle of cool claret; for I thought it not unlikely we should require it before we reached that tremendous height--the Old Fort, --in mid-day, under the influence of a broiling hot sun, as well as to cool the choler of Master Humphries, which I foresaw would be not a little ruffled when he discovered the trick I had played upon him. While partaking our repast, Captain Mackintosh was announced, to whom the challenge was shown. O it is some mistake, he observed; it must be, depend upon it. Mistake! reiterated Humphries; a queer sort of a mistake, I guess--why there is his Commandantships letter--mistake, and be d d to him! Mackintosh expressed his regret matters had gone so far; and bidding us farewell, took his departure--to go, not to his hotel, as I presumed, but to the Government house, as the sequel of my story will explain. Having consumed between us some quantity of kid-chops, and dispatched two bottles of claret, off we started to attend the fatal meeting. I could not but help laughing to see my gallant friend fully equipped in his hussar dress, booted and spurred, and ready for the fight. We had just obtained the opposite shore of the bay, when our ears were saluted with cries issuing from...
