FBC LTD, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Southern Planter, Vol. 18: Devoted to Agriculture, Horticulture, and the Household Arts; November, 1858 It has been stated above, that all petres ce nt manures, (in whatever stage of the progress of fermentation and decay, and also in the freshest and soundest state of the materials, before fermentation has begun, consist partly of soluble matter al leady fit to serve as food for pl, ants and pat-?y of ha1d, insoluble matter, inert and at that time useless as manu1e. The p10 portions and quantities of these different parts continually vary in the. Same body. With the progress of decomposition, by the insoluble parts changing to soluble, and the soluble to the gaseous form, and then passing off, and being lost. If ma nure, whether in its newest and soundest, or in its oldest and most reduced state, or in any intermediate stage of decomposi tion, be applied to land, and plowed nu der, as is usual, the soluble parts will be dissolved by the first abundant rain. if roots of then growing plants had already spread throughout the soil, and were everywhere present when this solution of the manure took place, they would begin immediately to suck up the liquid food thus offered, and m a few days the whole supply might be put to use, and converted to patts of the plants so fed. But if no plants were yet growing when this solu tion occurred, then none of this food could be put to such use. If the soil is properly constituted to combine with, and retain such putrescent matter, and also it then requires the supply, it may be so saved until plants are in possession of...
