Along with whatever any intelligence knows, it must, as the ground or condition of its knowledge, have some cognisance of itself. OBSERVATIONS AND F. XPLAATIONS, 1. Self or the me is the common centre, the continually known rallying-point, in which all our Propositions meet and agree. It is the ens unum, et finis ultimus, et principium cognitionis, in omnibus notitiis. Its apprehension is essential to the existence of our, and of all, knowledge. And thus Proposition I. forms an explicit answer to the question laid down in the Introduction (85) as the first question of philosophy: What is the one feature present in all our knowledge, - the common point in which all our cognitions unite and agree, - the element in which they are identical. The ego is this feature, point, or element: it is the common centre which is at all. Table of Contents INTRODUCTION; 1 The word philosophy is here employed, 1; 2 The two main requisitions of philosophy, ib; 3 Which of them is the more stringent, 2; 4 The value of...
