Excerpt: . . . it possible that, in an acquaintance of three days, you should have observed as many disagreeable qualities as any one else could have discovered in twice the number of years You do me as much injustice as you suppose me to be guilty of towards Mrs. M'Kay. All the qualities, good or bad-- Nay, you have not mentioned one good All the qualities, then, that I have enumerated, are either what I observed myself, or what must, infallibly, be the companions of such. In short, I have not the least doubt that your new relation will make you perfectly miserable, unless--- I am delighted you have a remedy to propose! Unless you will condescend to listen to a proposal from your excellent friend, Inver-. craig; which is simply this--that you will permit him to offer you a home where his greatest study will be to ensure your happiness. The jealousy of the new mistress of Brachenshaw- Pardon me for interrupting you. If she is the person you describe her, there will be the greater need of my attendance on the aged friend who has taken care of my in-. fancy; and, whatever may be the treatment I meet with, I shall submit to it with patience. But, supposing, Miss Colraith, that Mr. M'Kay himself should approve of the plan Why, even then, I could not leave his fast declining years to the care of strangers. I have a debt of gratitude to the poor old man,...
