Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: .that I do not regard the Art School in its greatest utility as a kind of forcing house only for the artist in the highest sense of that term. I have used the words Architecture, Sculpture, and Painting in their widest and most comprehensive value. The courses under each of these heads should provide technical and artistic training for all the Art craftsmen required in the building, decorating, and furnishing of a city--each in their degree. That a student should iwts to the last step of one or other of these courses and so become an artist is not more important than that the whole lump of our craftsmen should be leavened by Art Education. The kind of School I have in view might be more accurately described as a Technical Art School when compared with the institution which tends to produce the Artist Painter of independent pictures--the Sculptor who can only model in clay unrelated things of personal expression, or the Architect who, like some of the French students, shows wonderful gifts of fancy and imagination in creating on paper wonderful and impossible monuments to the mighty dead. In a poetical and personal sense these things have high value, but the artist cf them cannot be made or very systematically trained. He is greatly the exception, and should not be calculated ujon. The five years technical and theoretical art school education which I would prescribe is in order to make competent the many. By the...
