BiblioGov. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 26 pages. Dimensions: 9.7in. x 7.4in. x 0.1in. The fatigue behavior of a 3rd generation PM disk alloy, LSHR, was studied at 1300 F. Tensile, creep, and fatigue tests were run on smooth and notched (Kt 2) bars under a variety of conditions. Analysis of smooth bar fatigue data, run under strain and load control with R ratios of 0 and -1, showed that a stress based Smith-Watson-Topper approach could collapse the data set. While the tensile and creep data showed substantial notch strengthening at 1300 F, the fatigue data showed a life deficit for the notch specimens. A viscoplastic finite element model, which accounted for stress relaxation at the notch tip, provided the best correlation between the notched and smooth bar behavior, although the fatigue data was not fully rationalized based on this simplified viscoplastic model of the stresses at the notch tip. Inclusion of a 90 sec dwell at peak load was found to dramatically decrease notch fatigue life. This result was shown to be consistent with a simple linear creep-fatigue damage rule, where creep damage dominated at low stresses and fatigue damage was more prevalent at higher stresses. This item ships from La Vergne, TN. Paperback.
