Udi Aloni (born December 10, 1959) is an Israeli and American filmmaker, writer and visual artist whose works focus on the interrelationships between art, theory, and action. He began his career as a painter, establishing the Bugarshov gallery in Tel Aviv, a home for contemporary art, cultural and political events. His work in large-scale art led him, while living in New York in the 1990s, to invent a method for advertising on urban architectural structures. In 1996, Aloni began making films. His documentary, Local Angel (2002), and his first feature-length fiction, Forgiveness (2006), are both radical interpretations of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that have stirred controversy in the Middle East and internationally. Aloni also directed Kashmir: Journey to Freedom (2008), a documentary about the nonviolent movement for liberation and freedom in Jammu and Kashmir that opened in the Berlin International Film Festival.
