Shaker Verlag Apr 2014, 2014. Taschenbuch. Condition: Neu. Neuware - Religious coping is one of the research areas within psychology of religion that is also reflected in general psychology. For instance, in the recently published handbook on 'stress, health and coping' edited by Folkman in 2011, room has been made for religious coping. This is the result of Kenneth Pargament's efforts in particular. For this recognition of religious coping to take place in other than Anglo-Saxon countries also, religious coping research will have to accustom to other cultural conditions. In the Netherlands, secularization, the 'new spirituality', and the multicultural society will have to be taken into account. The latter aspect implies, on the one hand, that new measuring instruments have to be developed, but, on the other hand, that Pargament's measuring instruments continue to be valid for certain groups within Dutch society (e.g. for traditionally committed Christians). Furthermore, religious coping research would gain in relevance if the effects of positive and negative coping could be made more transparent from a theoretical point of view. Attribution theory and attachment theory appear to be fruitful theories for this. There are also implications for spiritual care. The authors start by again emphasizing their basic assumption: the necessity of attention to religious coping in mental healthcare. People keep on knockin' on heaven's door. Although the role of institutionalized religion is declining in Western society, religion remains a substantive factor in human life, especially in times of trouble. For healthcare insurers, contributing to the improvement of clients' (religious) coping is an important legitimation for funding hospital and community spiritual care. Furthermore, insights gained from religious coping research will have to be embedded in healthcare chaplains' training. It is, for instance, important to know that 'spiritual distress' can have a considerably negative impact on clients' well-being....
