It is in shape to be of use to the agricultural college students throughout this country. This is really the first large body of evidence or information in its natural form brought from Europe for American use in such shape that farmers, students, legislators, can themselves analyze the material, arrive at their own conclusions and work out the necessary solution. That really was the most important result of the tour, the gathering of a great mass of information as to the business side of European farming. And not only was material information collected. I doubt whether any commission instituted by any American organization has had more effect in a short time than did that body of Americans touring Europe, studying agricultural cooperation and rural credit. The federal office to which I am attached maintains a clipping bureau. The mass of clippings that came in during my absence, relating to the Commission and dealing with European and other credit systems, was stupendous. It seemed as if every paper in the country at least once a week said something about the commission and it always was headed Rural Credit, Cooperation for Business Purposes, or something of that sort. The information carried was often of little value, but the subject was up; people were thinking of it, were being educated. The history of cooperation...
