It lies in my hand, A dead, dead rose; Not lovely now, but it nice was fair. No sweets are shed From its petals dead, But its thorns are sharp as ever they were. It lies in my heart, A dead, dead love; Nor hope, nor happiness brings to me, A faded flower, It has lived its hour; But its thorns are sharp as they used to be. Ylorence Way Wright. An American Ideal. By CHARLES H. CHAPMAN, P11. D., President of the Uneversiiy of Oregon. H N our childhood we are near to God. The angels still visit and whisper news from the unforgotten realms we have left behind. So sings the poet of immortality. Fresh from the Creator s hand; nay, trailing after us clouds of glory from the Eternal we come into this world of filth and deformity. It does not take long for the clouds of glory to fade away; but there is a time between childhood and manhood, before God has shut away his face and the everlasting doors turning on their golden hinges have come between us and our home. when life in one great throb of strength and hope. VVe feel then that no task is too hard for us, that no prize is too high, that all things great and worthy are predestined for our use. It is in that golden prime that the youth reads in his book of one who...
