Some days before Mr. Perrot--who, after losing the v- v--- office of Governor of Acadia, had remained in that provu pursued ince for his private affairs--had embarked in a ketch English, th the Sieur Duclos, his clerk, with the view of trading along the coast. On the 27th of May, as he was returning to Port Royal, unconscious that the English were in possession, he was--fortunately for him--detained by a headwind at the mouth of the bay. Then, not seeing the usual sentinel, he suspected something, and got into a canoe with Mr. Damour, a Canadian gentleman, and an Indian, to ascertain what had happened. After advancing three leagues, he perceived an English ship at anchor in the river, on which the town was built, and heard the report of several cannon and volleys of musketry. Believing that an action was going on, he hid his canoe in the woods, and went on foot to the first house, which he found abandoned. Retiring in haste, he jumped into his canoe, and pushed off to...
