IT is a fact which I hold to be indisputable that the immense material progress of modern civilization centres around one grand scientific discovery - steam power, chiefly as employed on railways. The men who laid down parallel bars of iron, horizontally, placing the locomotive on them, revolutionized the earth and its inhabitants. It is astounding to think to what an extent this revolution, affecting the deepest interests of mankind, the intercourse between individuals and nations, has developed in the comparatively short time of half a century. The first line of railway served by locomotives, that from Stockton to Darlington, was opened in the autumn of 1825, and at this moment the civilized world is encircled by a network of railways, Europe alone possessing over a hundred thousand miles of iron highroads. No human discovery - not even that wonderful one of the printing press, another revolutionizer of mankind - ever made progress so fast as the modern railway.
