The Chesapeake formation contains sands and marls, with only local developments of clay or diatomaceous earth. It is of little economic value to the clay worker. PLEISTOCENE CLAYS. These overlie the earlier formations of the Coastal Plain, and in some cases extend up on the rocks of the Piedmont Plateau. They form a mantle of sandy clay, loam, and gravel of various thickness. The loams, which belong to the Columbia group, are very extensive and rarely wanting, so that they form an abundant source of brick-making material which is not overlooked. In most cases the Pleistocene clays underlie terraces at no great elevation above sea level, but up to the present time the Pleistocene clays have been used for nothing except common brick and earthenware. Columbia clays are well developed at a number of points, as in the cut north of Perryville, Cecil County; at the base of Bull Mountain, Cecil County; and at many points around the city of Baltimore not more than 30 feet above sea level. At the last-named locality they are extensively used for the manufacture of common brick, for they are moderately plastic and have sufficient iron to burn to a good red color. In Anne Arundel County they are well exposed in brick-clay pits near Curtis Bay. An important series of Pleistocene clays of higher grade is found outcropping along the shore of Chesapeake Bay from Bodkin Point southward. Many of these outcrops...
