Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: .his offence was not considered to be a capital crime, and he escaped with a reprimand. In the mean time, Bennett, the beaten constable, had preferred a complaint against Sir Richard Carr and his servants; and the reader may easily imagine that the legal acts necessarily arising out of this, injured the commissioner in the opinion of the people. At his departure his fury broke out openly against the Massachusetters; he told the officials, angrily, that the king s pardon for their offences during the late rebellion depended entirely on their future good conduct, and threatened the head men with the punishment which had fallen on so many in England: namely, the gallows or the axe. Colonel Cartwright, intellectual, and better fitted for his post, had made himself detested throughout his entire stay by the disgusting and irritable manner in which he rejected all attentions and courteousness. From the very beginning, prejudiced and mistrustful, and now more than ever embittered by the manifold instances of ill will he met with from the people, he was completely unfitted to compose differences which the clearest head and most skilful hand could not attempt without danger, or touch without injury. 1660 commissoner9 nat scarcely left, when a letter from the king announced the outbreak of hostilities with the French, and recommended them rules for their self-defence, and a campaign against the-colonists of Canada. Whilst artillery and weapons were sent to New York, the colonists of New England were abandoned...
