Excerpt from Henri De Toulouse-Lautrec: Au Moulin Rouge, In the Art Institute of Chicago Though Lautrec had sketched his first cabaret subjects in 18 it was not until he discovered the possibilities ree or four years later, that he really found himself. At that moment the Montmartre cabaret was at the height of its fame. The management had shrewdly hired the most popular and eccentric dancers in Paris; along with them appeared famous singers of ballads and sentimental songs. The place was thronged with artists, writers, Bohemians and tourists, and nightly Lautrec had a special table reserved, where he sat, sharply observing and setting down the effects of alcohol and depravity upon the haggard faces of the clientele. Ah, la vie, la vie, he used to mutter as his hand traced the lines of a broken profile or captured, with inimitable swiftngness, the splayed and awkward movement of some dancer s leg.
