HE Aurora which had risen on the soul of Juliet was no evanescent brightness, no passing beauty. Anna instantly felt the change in her young companion s manner, and could hear it in the tone of her voice. And how would the suffering missionary have borne her own heavy burden of trial, had not a bright young sympathising friend been sent to help her to support it. Anna, in addition to her physical infirmities and the trial of increasing darkness, was in anxious suspense regarding her husband and Fritz. On the evening of the following day the sledge returned from Bethabara, under the charge of an Esquimaux belonging to that place. If there had been a lingering hope in Anna s mind that her husband, not finding a prolonged stay needful, would return in the sledge, that hope vanished away, as Juliet, who watched from the window, announced that only one form was in the conveyance, and that the form of a native. But he may bring a letter. Oh! that I could rise! cried Anna, making a fruitless attempt to get up. I will bring it! cried Juliet, throwing her grey plaid over head and shoulders, as she hurried to open the door even before the sledge could reach it. She soon returned to Anna, with a letter in her hand, which smelt strongly of the disinfectant, of which the Pastor, at the suggestion of his thoughtful wife, had taken a supply....
