The camp is situated in an out-of-the-way part, and covers a large area including temporary dwellings for the boys to sleep in, a hut for the doctor to live in, and kraals for goats, etc. When the operation is about to commence, the doctor places a clay pot of water on a large fire burning in the centre of the kraal, and into this puts two powders, one black, the other white. Then he leads the way to a small clearing about twelve yards in diameter, only a few paces from the main camp, but hidden from it by bushes. On one side of this is a thick hedge, in the centre of which is a small hole, just big enough to let a man pass through on his hands and knees. The doctor takes up his position in the centre of this place, where a small hole has been made in the sand. He lays out his instruments, consisting of a collection of razors, and takes a pinch of black powder, some of which he puts into the hole, and with the rest makes a smudge on each side of his face. In the meantime a drum beats vigorously, and a couple of Kaffir pianos play noisily, while the assistants dance and sing round the doctor. The patient to be operated upon is then driven through the gap in the hedge described above, and is at once tripped up...
