Excerpt from Discourse Delivered at Providence, August 5, 1836: In Commemoration of the First Settlement of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations; Being the Second Centennial Anniversary of the Settlement of Providence March 27, 1634. Here, indeed, was an asylum for the Catholic and the Protestant, such as then existed no where else in the Christian world; and, what might excite our special wonder, under the government of Roman Catholics. It is to be remembered, however, that this colony belonged to a Protestant nation, and could not have existed if there had been no liberty for Protestants. It has been suggested by an able writer* of our country, that a toleration of the Church of England would have satisfied the English government; yet it could not have escaped the sagacity of that Observing statesman, Sir George Calvert, that such a toleration would have been the most dangerous for his Catholic colonists. He had experienced, in Virginia, what his colony would have to fear from their Episcopalian neighbors; and if he was compelled to tolerate one sect of Protestants, true. Policy required...
