Excerpt from Our National Sin: A Sermon, Preached on the Day of the National Fast, September 26, 1861, in the South Reformed Dutch Church, New York City Of sin, in this its essential character of finite rebel lion against the Infinite, we may say it belongs to man as man. It is no mere fortuity, which may or may not occur. To err is human. By nature, there is none loyal to his Maker; no, not one. Contempt for the Divine authority may, therefore, be pronounced to be the easily besetting sin of our race, as such. In one form or another, we are rebels, all of us. But for each individual, besides this generic de pravity, which is in him like poisoned blood, there is also some specific infirmity peculiarly his own; some one form of spiritual disloyalty, towards which he gravitates with a special momentum; some one sin out of all the catalogue of human offences, which he com mits with the most fatal facility and frequency. It may not be known to the world. It may not be known even to himself, by reason of moral blindness. It may be known only to God. But, in either case, it is his easily besetting sin; stamping its burning seal upon his inmost character, even though it may set no mark of shame upon his brow. As thus of individuals, so likewise of nations. Nations are not mere masses and aggregates Of popula tion; they are organisms. Each is endowed with a sort of moral personality, and has a determinate char. Acter of its own. Individuals may be born and die, generations may come and go; but the national pulse beats...
