Forgotten Books, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from Physiological Chemistry, Vol. 3 Mulder himself was by no means unconscious of the imperfections of this method, and endeavoured in union with Donders to approach this somewhat inaccessible department of science in a totally opposite direction. The tissues to be examined were exposed to the action of various chemical reagents, and the changes which their texture underwent were observed under the microscope, with the view of deducing from them conclusions regarding the differences in chemical constitution. This course was, however, first adopted by J. Müller, who was led by it to several results of much value in relation to physiology and general anatomy. Several observers followed with more or less success the path which he had thus marked out; but their investigations (unfortunately for us) had reference more to the histological than to the chemical side of the inquiry. Histology has already derived the most important aid from this method, since the reagents which we apply to microscopical preparations are no longer limited to dilute acetic acid, tincture of iodine, or, at most, perhaps a little ammonia. It was by means of microscopico-chemical analysis that the structure of the different horny tissues was first clearly exhibited; who could formerly have established with such precision that nails, cows horn, and whalebone are composed of aggregations of individual cells, from the most careful tracing of their developmental history? Would the axis-cylinder of the nerve-fibres have remained so long unperceived, or at all events a subject of doubt, if at an earlier period we had been more familiar with micro-chemical investigations? Chemical appliances have often afforded most important service to histology, even when not promoting our knowledge of the...
