He would sell his rights, but various acts of treason mean that he has none left to sell. He d pawn his heart, but he loaned it to somebody years ago and she still hasn t returned it. He d even sell his mind, if only he could find it. All that remains to Olec is the soul he doesn t believe in, which he sells in order to free the woman who borrowed his heart: Diamona Oranous, the last surviving member of the outlawed Sonat sect. Olec has never really felt at home on Earth, and all he wants is to feel his own existence: to die or to be born. After dying three times and being born twice, Olec gets his wish, though he must stand on the cusp of obliteration to truly exist: to know that he has always already existed for the long lifespan of our Universe. In the end, Olec does not die alone. He understands that kind of thinking to be a part of the boundless presumption of conceited humankind.
