When seas were calm, and, far away, Blue sky and dark blue water met, As tranquil as the day wherein There brooded not a cloudy threat, They hung o er ocean s gently heaving breast, Flitting with languid grace from crest to crest. When waves uprearing high and fierce Curved stalwart necks in wild disdain, The little waifs yet onward plied, Tangle in nets of flying mane, Hoping, perchance, to find at last a nest In the vague distance of the gray-bound West.
