This series follows the experiences of the author as he traveled to the far north to help at an outpost camp for tourists. He made nine trips from Wisconsin to the camp in the Northwest Territories of Canada, 260 air miles from the nearest town. Challenges of surviving in this remote region are explored in this series of books. The effects of an extremely cold summer for the camp and guests are the basis for book 2. People who take summer tours to the tundra region of the Canadian Arctic may face unpredictable and dangerous weather conditions. Each day is an excursion into the unknown with no guarantee of a safe return to camp. An overnight boat trip to an outpost tent site turns into a life and death situation when the guides and guests become trapped by ice. Unable to reach their destination or return to camp they need to find a solution before they succumb to the freezing temperatures. Desperate to reach safety, their only option is to attempt to make their way across the weakened ice.
