PayloadAccommodations TheRRSis to be flown in a heatshielddown launchconfiguration to maintain a constant axial acceleration load direction during the entire mission. A payload fairing is required to protect the RRriottapa during ascent. The most important constraint imposed by the fairing is on the size of the RRS ( i. e. , diameter and length ). For the ELVs a large enough fairing cannot be developed. Payload fitting ( PAF ) constraint on RRS. g. were not assessed in the contract. Payload Accessibility RRS close-out is to occur up to T-4 hours before launch. Close-out, is assumed to involve human access ( e. g. , final inspections detachments of umbilicals, rodent cage replacement ). Flight Environment Thermal loads during launch vary moderately among ELVs. Some alternative candidate ELVs may require fairing insulation to reduce internal temperatures below RRS tolerance. Acceleration and shock loads were also determined. It is required that the ELV not impose more than 10g axial acceleration loads on the rodents. Cost per Flight Life cycle cost was a key issue regarding selection of the candidate ELV fleet. 5. 2 Maturity Evaluation Factors ELV maturity was considered a top-level programmatic concern which should be addressed after technical merit was established. Launch vehicle maturity factors were evaluated and included the following: Company Relevant Experience and Past Performance ELV Design Approach...
