PROPOSITION SECOND, As far as possible, invalids should be restored to their original homes, and the communities to which they belong should absorb them, by assigning to them, by conventional agreement, the lighter occupations; and no provision separating them from their families, or diminishing their domestic responsibilities, should be encouraged. For, wherever invalids have homes, public opinion should be directed to these as the best places for them; the object always being to keep them from ultimately drifting into town or county pauper asylums. Home is generally the best hospital, even as repose is often the best remedy. Experience also shows that men will endure greater privations and discomforts, without murmuring, in their own homes, than the most trifling ones in public institutions. For, although they may be beneficiaries, the sense of gratitude towards the power which provides for them, never so abundantly, is not sufficient to overcome the feeling of restraint, which required obedience to the rules of an establishment generally occasions in its inmates. These retreats, however well situated, and with whatever advantages of locality and adornment supplied, are yet dull and heart-crushing to most persons, in whom the idea of residence is, in some degree, associated with compulsion. The regulations relating to hours--to roll-call--to permissions of absence and to penalties for infractions of rules--become irksome and intolerable, and men are ready to put up with anything at home, rather than be prisoners of state in a palace. This is human nature,...
