Subito Press, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book. Poetry. CAMERA is both paeon and lament for a world in flux. To render such a world with its unresolvable tensions between time s embodiment and erasure is the focus of the collection. What does it mean to hold many irreconcilable presences? The task is to measure small changes, arrivals and departures. The work is a border between existence and disappearance. Moments named and described are framed. Though the created world with its emotional truths will not last, it is a topography of words and a realm of heightened scrutiny. To hold and revere its presence is the poem s agency. A world is predicated by representation of nature, seasons, ritual, location, and the arts. Loss looming, love is attention given and the human bond holding writer and reader. I lifted to mind a piece of bright blue air, wrote Robert Creeley, in a line Maxine Chernoff quotes in CAMERA. It s apt: this is a book full of air and breezes, populated with doves and thrushes, swallows and crows. It s an earthy book, too, where tender roots push through an eroticized earth (thigh of hill/breast of leaves/belly of witness). It s never just a book of the body, though, or of the material world: each sharply sensed moment spirals out into history, geography, biology, or grief. It is a book where the world aspires to be voiced, and where words send their tendrils toward the next refrain. CAMERA lifts a world to mind, and holds it there. --Robert Archambeau.
