At Tharand he is found working in the laboratory of the Royal Academy of Agriculture, studying methods under the famous Julius A. Stockhardt. At Heidelberg he listened to the lectures of the great Robert Wilhelm Bunsen, and last, but not least, we hear of him making observations in Paris under the master Boussingault. Not finding an appropriate opportunity for applying his newly-gained knowledge - the application of chemistry to the interpretation of biological processes - Storer, on his return to the United States in 1857, while the panic of 1857 was at its height, established himself as a consulting and analytical chemist in Boston. In 1865, however, he accepted a position as chemist with the Boston Gas Light Company, and also...
