She was listening to an oft-told tale, kneeling in the firelight, at her aunt s knee, the ruddy glow tenderly touching her fair soft hair and fairer forehead, her big blue eyes lifted lovingly to Mrs. Tregonell s face. And he was a widower, Aunt Diana, she repeated, with an expression of distaste, as if something had set her teeth on edge. I cannot help wondering that you could care for a widower-a man who had begun life by caring for somebody else. Do you suppose any one desperately in love ever thinks of the past? asked another voice out of the twilight. Those infatuated creatures called lovers are too happy and contented with the rapture of the present. One would think you had tremendous experience, Jessie, by the way you lay down the law, said Christabel, laughing. But I want to know what Auntie has to say about falling in love with a widower. If you had ever seen him and known him, I don t think you would wonder at my liking him, answered Mrs. Tregonell, lying back in her armchair, and talking of the story of her life in a placid way, as if it were the plot of a novel, so thoroughly does time smooth the rough edge of grief. When he came to my father s house, his young wife had been dead just two years-she died three days after the birth of her first child-and Captain Hamleigh was very sad and grave, and seemed to take very little pleasure in life. It was in the shooting season, and the other men were out upon the hills all day.
