Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from John Stevens: An American Record Every pioneer is, by definition, the first in his field, the breaker of fresh ground, and the sower of seed. Usually, his energies are confined to one chosen field and rarely does he live to see it come to fruit. John Stevens worked in a dozen fields, not always reaching the end of the furrow but almost unfailingly foreseeing that end. Moreover, just a century ago, when he was eighty, he saw his two brightest dreams come true. The Stevens steamboats were then the fastest in this country and the great era of American railroad building was at last fairly begun. It detracts nothing from his farsightedness that it should have required this additional century for men of to-day to learn how to accomplish the engineering triumphs that he was not afraid to attempt. Behind him, he left an amazing collection of private letters, essays, drawings, patents, maps, deeds, and contemporary newspapers, all covering not only his own days but also those of his father and his grandfather. There are the letters he received, with his laborious copies of the answers returned; the letters of many members of his immediate family, addressed to himself or to one another; and the great number of documents and pamphlets which he himself had printed or which were sent to him by scores of friends among scientists, statesmen, and all other men of mind. The whole makes a story which, for one reason or another, has appeared only by widely scattered and often quite inaccurate bits in print.
